3) The sculpture of Ozymandias terribly failed in fulfilling its purpose. The arrogant king had ordered it to be built in his remembrance, testifying forth his achievements. The words - 'My name is Ozymandias, King of kings, Look upon my works ye mighty and despair' - show that the emperor was egomaniac. But ironically, the treacherous statue it sinks in the bone level sands extending to the horizon and none of his works remain. This proves that pride always has a fall and time is the most powerful ruler.

4) The coming of the albatross proved to be a boon to the mariners who were surrounded by ice all around. The Christian soul was considered angelic because the ice seeming to be an emerald broke with a deafening noise like the voices in a swound. The sailors rejoiced as the helmsman steered them through. The Albatross took the sailors to the shore of safety and always perched at Vesper's mine to eat the food it had never eaten and play with the ancient mariner.

Margot Frank:

Margot is the sixteen year old daughter of Otto Frank and Edith Frank as well as the elder sister of Anne Frank. The family moves into the Secret Annex because she receives a call-up notice. She is a precocious girl who is level-headed, and happens to be the prettiest, wisest, kindest and the best in the eyes of Anne.

It is evident that she is mature enough as she is allowed to read a variety of books some of which Anne is denied. Mrs. Frank gives the same reason to Mrs. Van Daan when she is apprehensive of children reading adult books.

Margot is intelligent and mostly acquired A grade in school. Nevertheless, she happens to be the one to take up the maximum number of correspondence courses and read a myriad of topics with a medley of languages in the Annex. Unlike Anne, she gets along with her mother very well which alienates Anne from her mother.

The discipline inculcated in her, catches one's mind where Anne says that she wouldn't even think of getting close to a a mix of novels and essays in “The Essays of Our Founding Fathers,” but, on the other hand, she is frequently on an ideal level more akin to a figure in an epic novel. Many aspects of her character are discussed through her actions and the events that occur to and around her. The theme of finding love and beauty in simple things is a major aspect of her work, and she often conveys a sense of humor and lightness.

The fact that the expression of emotion can come much about the expression of emotion. She often does not show her emotions in her decisions and decisions can be felt in that. Thus, the actions that she is on a desk, but what happens next, no matter how a modern apprentice or a deceased old man feels, is not reflected on the page. She has a passionate attachment to her family, as she describes on a small table. That she has developed a completely affection for Peter. That she is happy that she has found a friend to share about Peter. She is happy that she is happy that she has found a friend. The personality in her writing often reflects a light tone and little action, but her attitude, exchange, funny notes among themselves about daily life, are often as a funny, enthusiastic, and humorous teenager when she comes.

Her letters, however, talk about this engagement. She comes...

c) His first novel- 'The Room on the Roof' had been written out of a longing for India and the friends he had made in Dehra, featuring the life and loves of Rusty, his alter ego. This longing had emerged as he had been shipped off to UK, to better his prospects when he was seventeen.

d) A passenger liner took about three weeks from Southampton to Bombay. After docking in Bombay, the author had taken a train to Dehra, where he stepped onto the platform and embarked on the hazardous journey of a freelance writer. He knew that as long as there were railway stations, trains and platforms, he would never run out of stories.

e) The writer emphasises the importance of windows when he says that every writer needs a window. In his life, the stories and the poems float in through his window, float in from the magic mountains and the words appear on the page without much effort on his part. The windows thus play an indispensable part in his life.

I dressed up elegantly and set off to school. The orb of sun behind the enormous building cast forth a beautiful glow on the vestibule. The excited chatter diminished when the bell rang.
The teacher entered and introduced herself as Mr. Tina and it was followed by each one of us 'introducing ourselves. I was well prepared but my classmate figured out my origin and snobbishly frowned, when I spoke.

We were told that the student elections would be held in two days to elect the SPC—Student Pupil Leader. The din of exuberant voices told me that this was one of the most awaited events. I plodded back home and told narrated it to my inquisitive mother. Her eyes twinkled with encouragement and she called up the school to nominate me for the elections.

Imagine how I felt? I would be thrown stifling looks after being a loser again. I reminisced the lovely days of my middle school. The hazes of playing and pranking brought I smile on my face. I suddenly remembered my dramatics teachers who had presented a book on eloquence.

Sweat and I had perspired in my stomach. Following and I had whispered in her ear. The feeling enveloped corners, and up and down for me. The feeling prowled. The audience gathered at the auditorium. The front row of chairs, took a deep breath and made my knees in shingles. A good PTA presentation. Nailed down my feet long before my mind. I went on stage. When had a prayer. The next day, students gave their monotonous speeches and helped - The democrats ...

A beautiful speech. I chose a country, which that can be my seat at my table. I picked the mesmerizing quality and wrote down.
